The Garden of Eden is a 1926 novel by Ernest Hemingway. It is his third novel, and was completed in 1923. The novel is set in the Garden of Eden, a location that is considered to be one of the most important works of fiction in the history of English literature. It is a story of love, loss, and the consequences of Adam and Eve's fall from grace. The novel is known for its vivid imagery and its exploration of themes such as love, lust, and sin. The novel is divided into two parts: the first part describes the Garden of Eden before the fall of man, and the second part describes the aftermath of the fall, including the expulsion from the Garden and the journey of the human race. The novel is a testament to Hemingway's skill as a writer, and his ability to convey complex ideas in a simple, straightforward manner. It is a novel that has captured the imaginations of readers for generations, and remains one of Hemingway's most popular works. It is a novel that is still read today, and is considered to be a classic of American literature.
